

Non-discriminate good or bad in general

Article Overview

Non-discrimination embodies impartiality, treating all individuals or actions fairly without bias, regardless of identity, background, or other distinguishing characteristics.

Understanding Non-Discrimination

Non-discrimination is the principle of treating individuals equally and fairly, without prejudice based on characteristics such as race, gender, religion, disability, age, sexual orientation, or social status . It emphasizes that decisions, judgments, or evaluations should not favor or disadvantage anyone arbitrarily, ensuring that all are assessed on relevant merits or ethical considerations rather than personal or societal biases .

Ethical and Moral Implications

In a general moral or ethical context, non-discrimination can be applied to assess actions as good or bad without bias. This means evaluating behaviors, policies, or outcomes based on their intrinsic fairness, consequences, or adherence to ethical principles, rather than on who is involved or affected. For example, a law or policy should be judged on whether it promotes justice and equity, not on whether it benefits a particular group .
